ABSTRACT

The phenomenon of juvenile delinquency is a consequence of globalization, leading to deviant behavior, one manifestation of which is the practice of klitih. According to data from the Yogyakarta Police, in 2021, the number of klitih cases increased to 58, with 102 suspects. This study examines the klitih phenomenon from a socio-legal perspective and investigates how laws and social norms influence klitih behavior in Yogyakarta. Lawrence Friedman's systems theory is employed to elucidate the handling of klitih within the jurisdiction of the Yogyakarta Police. The objectives of this study are to analyze criminal policies related to the handling of juvenile delinquency in Indonesia, identify the factors contributing to klitih in Yogyakarta, and explore the socio-legal dimensions of the klitih crime in the Yogyakarta Police jurisdiction. This research adopts an empirical juridical approach, with a socio-legal study and descriptive analytical specifications. Data were collected through field research and literature review, which were then analyzed qualitatively. The results of the study show that criminal policies related to juvenile delinquency in Indonesia are governed by the Penal Code and Law Number 11 of 2012 on the Juvenile Criminal Justice System. These policies are based on international legal instruments such as the Riyadh Guidelines, the Tokyo Rules, and the Beijing Rules. They accommodate the application of restorative justice in the form of diversion for children, with the police holding authority at the investigation, inquiry, and arrest stages. The factors contributing to klitih include intrinsic factors such as intelligence, age, gender, and family status, as well as extrinsic factors such as household environment, education, social interactions, and mass media. The handling of klitih in the Yogyakarta Police jurisdiction involves investigation, inquiry, and arrest, as well as examination assistance in collaboration with the Juvenile Correctional Institution (LPKA) and the Class I Correctional Center (Bapas) in Yogyakarta.
