

CHAPTER IV

CONCLUSION

American Dream as we know is a dream or value which allows people to gain success, every person has the same chance to pursue their ideal life. However, if we look at the reality, society is not just goes under the ideal values as the American Dream, instead there are many circumstances people have to dealing with. One of the circumtaces is the social stratification or social class. In the previous discussion we have found that the realization of the American dream is seems inseparable from the social stratification issue especially as depicted in The Hunger Games and the Mocking Jay Part 1 movie.

As in the discussion we know that the society in the movie have to dealing with inequality upon their hope to live in an ideal life. The inequality as depicted in the movie is seen from the lifestyle between the capitol and the people of the districts. The capitol as the central government upon the thirteen districts is depicted as the bourgeoisie, whereas the people in the districts as the working class. Moreover, the Capitol itself is a capitalist government with a dictatorial leader, they are strong in economy because every districts supplies them in the mood of production. As a result, the Capitol dominates upon the districts and lead a social inequality between the two. These factors lead people in the districts struggle to pursue their goal in bring a better land for them to live. The government, the social economy, obstruct their chance to live in a ideal world in their own land. In order to pursue their ideal life, people have to put more effort on it, because they do not have the same chance since they only have a little in influence due to their economic background also they do not have power over their own life because the government take all control upon them.

Based on the discussions above, it can be conclude that the individual's chance in pursuing the American Dream is might be determined by their ability in economy and their environment to support its ideal life. The economy by means is how people can meet their meets, and the environment by means is how their surrounding social conditions can provide a wide space for people to have the same opportunity
