ABSTRACT

Emotional abuse is a form of violence that is not physically visible but has a significant psychological impact. In the context of grandmother-granddaughter relationships, the relationship between granddaughters and their grandmothers has a distinctive emotional closeness. Grandmothers play an important role in the lives of young adult granddaughters, either as second caregivers or as emotional supporters. The purpose of this study was to explore the experiences of early adult women who experienced emotional abuse from their grandmothers. A purposive sampling technique was used in this study to find participants who had experienced emotional abuse from their grandmother and were female, in early adulthood. This research uses qualitative methods, namely the phenomenological approach. The interview method used is semi-structured, data collection techniques and the data that has been obtained is analysed using the interpretative phenomenological analysis (IPA) method. Eight superordinate themes were found, namely (1) confusion and suspicion due to the relationship between parents and grandmother, (2) difficulty understanding grandmother's treatment, (3) distant relationship with grandmother, (4) attempts to recover from the impact of grandmother's treatment, (5) mentally burdened about grandmother's expectations (6) hopelessness due to relationship with grandmother (7) frustration interacting with grandmother, (8) negative self-image due to grandmother's actions and one theme specific to subject S, namely difficulty coping with social situations involving confrontation. The results of this study are that Emotional Abuse has an impact on social life and perspective on self. The factors for the occurrence of Emotional Abuse from grandmothers in the three participants showed the influence of conflict between parents and grandmothers, financial conditions and the dislike and opposing traits of grandmothers.
