

CHAPTER IV

CONCLUSION

The problems of reproductive freedom, birth control, and contraception have greatly influenced discrimination issues. These cases explain a situation where women are the gender that experiences discrimination due to social conflicts that occurred in the 19th century in the United States. However, this case occurred because of the lack of regulation, which can also lead to problems between the government and citizens, especially since the victims are women.

In some cases of social conflict in society, for example, termination of pregnancy, which is a significant problem from the less respectability of the government because, with the termination of pregnancy, the cases of reproductive choice will be regulated, for instance, birth control if the pregnancy is unwanted then the government will take action by committing violence as well as other things to stop unwanted pregnancies the government at that time introduced contraception where contraception at that time was not safe for women's health conditions. Moreover, abortion has become an obligation to avoid unwanted pregnancies. If this is not done, then the government will give punishment.

Furthermore, the Bad Feminist essay also explains the effects of gender discrimination, such as gender bias and sexual violence on gender. This represents women in danger, such as women experiencing marginalization in media television, which describes women's gestures in a very unusual way. Another problem is the rampant cases of gender-based sexual violence, and the victims who experience this violence are women. Where there is an illustration of gang rape or group rape of women. The following case is racism against the non-white, where this racist case occurs because it has become a culture in America. Many victims of this racism receive lousy treatment in the social environment, such as cases of murder of black people. As for the solutions given by the government at that time, such as President Barak Obama, to stop cases of racism, in conclusion, political responsibility did not answer this case because racism does not care about respectability, wealth, education, and other statuses.