

CHAPTER IV

CONCLUSION

Based on the analysis conducted in the previous chapter, the writer can conclude that in the film The Worst Person in the World, the writer found several attitudes or actions of Julie's character that reflect the attitudes of radical libertarian feminism. The first is that Julie refuses to get married. The reason is because she was not ready for a marriage bond which she considered would be one of the obstacles and limit her in doing anything. In addition, a trauma from childhood also made Julie decide not to marry. Secondly, Julie chooses childfree because she thinks children are a burden for her. The third is Julie always feels dissatisfied when it comes to men and still wants to feel free at her age.

The film The Worst Person in the World is one of the many films that discuss libertarian radical feminism. From this film, we can also see Julie's attitude in dealing with her quarter life crisis. This also reflects life in American society. Some communities there still apply a patriarchal system. Therefore, it is not surprising that many women in the United States choose not to marry and not have children. And they are free to have relationships with anyone without a marriage bond. The writer hopes that this research can equip readers with knowledge about libertarian radical feminism. Suggestions for future researchers to be able to analyze this topic with a new model and it is highly recommended that further researchers can connect this topic with current problems in the surrounding environment so that the topic of libertarian radical feminism can develop in an easy way to understand.
