

CHAPTER IV

CONCLUSION

The Sorcerer's Apprentice (2010) as a film can be said to be successfully portrait how the writer can analyse a fictional character's Individual psychology as how I would analyse a regular person. By applying Alfred Adler's theory through the character David Stutler, the writer can analyse his individual psychology through several indication. To analyse Dave psychological state, the writer is using Alfred's theory where I observe his inferiority feeling, fictional finalism goal, social interest, life style, creative power, his way of striving for superiority, and his early memory.

In his early memory, because of some accidents, Dave grew up with trauma which make him suffer to an exaggerated inferior feeling. His exaggerated inferiority feeling was caused by his low self-esteem and his trauma which makes him to strive for superiority instead of success like everybody else who has healthy inferiority feeling. Because of his situation which differs from everyone, his final goal is a humble one where he just want to live normal just like anybody else. He have difficulty in communicating with other people and in turn he has little interest in social life, and as a result he struggle to fulfill the three problem of neighbor love, sexual love, and occupation.

With the aid of several characters such as Baltazar as his mentor and Becky Barnes as his love interest, Dave can attempt to strive his superiority in which he can somewhat live a normal life. Before he met his mentor and love interest, Dave can be said to be quite accomplished academically. Balthazar advises him on how to study magic and life advices, while Becky gives him the motivation to strive for superiority. Dave's creativity helped him achieve superiority by applying all the knowledge he knew in the face of adversity. He managed to combined science and magic into one and by Balthazar words he became more confident in his ability. He defeated his adversity which in turn he fulfilled his destiny and boosted his self-esteem to achieve his goal of pursuing his love interest.